

Standard Fantasy Background Packages

A background package is just a group of suggested Assets for a character. Even if a character is imagined to have a background in question, the player doesn't have to take the package, these are just shortcuts to creating more rounded out characters if the player decides they're useful (the package has no mechanical impact itself, and doesn't have to be noted, although if the player has a written background for the character, it would make sense to note it there).

Also note that characters are individuals and may have just some of the Assets in the package. And they may add EOCs that they figure were obtained from the background as well, that are simply ones that are unique to the character, etc. The player should consider renaming the EOCs picked up from background packages if they feel they have something more suitable to the character, and should definitely define relationships more specifically in terms of the name of the NPC or group with whom they have the relationship, as well as the nature of the relationship.

These packages are suitable for standard fantasy settings, and absolutely do not preclude the many other backgrounds a character might have.

Form Background

Form packages detail the sorts of stats and distinctions that a character with a particular form may have. Not all characters need a form package, if your character doesn't happen to have any extraordinary abilities, just omit this. Note that lots of humans will have a form package despite humans being sort of the "typical" character, as many fun fantasy human characters have some special nature to their birth.
